Amtrak began operations in May 1971 with a mixture of equipment from its predecessor railroads, much of which was painted in a variety of railroad-specific paint schemes. This era was later referred to as the Rainbow Era, due to the mix-matched colorful trains Amtrak used. Amtrak elected not to keep the same rolling stock on the same routes and it was not unexpected to find rolling stock from anywhere in the US on any train. To build the brand of Amtrak as a unified passenger railroad, the equipment was gradually repainted into system-wide Phases starting around 1972 with Phase I. The phases are referred to in numerical sequential order, usually in Roman numerals. Up until the introduction of the Acela, phases were painted on all equipment. Since 2000 Amtrak has started splitting phases up between equipment with locomotives getting Phase V & cars getting Phase IVb. While previously locomotives and rail cars could be painted in different styles they were still referred to as being in the same phase, with often the locomotive versions getting an unofficial nickname. Phase V was introduced with the arrival of the Acela Express high speed train set. It is currently the most common paint scheme on Amtrak's locomotives. The new paint scheme was originally used on the 'Genesis' locomotives, starting with units 123-207, and eventually spreading to all units in the class. The current Phase V consists of a red stripe that runs down the bottom of the locomotive/car, and then a blue nose which runs up the side of the locomotive in a 'wave' form. Not all cars in this phase have the blue wave. This is the first paint scheme to use the current Phase V paint on Genesis units sporting the most recent Amtrak Travelscape logo,^[5] which is portrayed on the side of most Phase V engines. Originally on Genesis units Phase V had a wider red stripe with a blue stripe just below it and near the front of the locomotive, there was a small Amtrak logo.^[6] Phase V has sometimes been referred to the '

Well, it does not show the infamous picture that we know: Joint statement by Indonesia and Malaysia on the Bukit Fadhil Multipurpose Development - widely known as the Joint Statement- looks innocent in comparison to other statements that came after it. When we met with the reviewer, we found out that the document was among the ones Malaysia or Malaysia's negotiating team gave to the Indonesians during their negotiations in November 2014. The revelation was made by Minister of Works in Indonesia, Tan Kian Sing. Don't you think this document is worthy of conservation? Tell us what you think! Soon enough, we came across the documents dating back to 2009. The secret document that covered the negotiations on Bukit Fadhil was originally written in English, and we were told by the translator that the document is of poor quality and it's been under the orders to keep the information secret since the negotiations began. But the Indonesian police team had to go through the document without revealing it to anyone. But one must not take it as it is being displayed, it is not yet a working version, have patience. Yes, we all came across those statement saying that the "peaceful island" Bukit Fadhil can be the east coast of Terengganu, Johor and Pulau Langkawi will be part of it.
