What's new in Common Hanzi Quiz - Simplified Chinese:

for English Students Part 6 The image of Chinese characters () may mystify many people, despite many web articles, books, and TV shows claiming to teach them. This is especially true among native English speakers who are trying to learn Simplified Chinese. A web article by American teenager Ruby Leung explains the secret of How to Chose Plural Characters. To her belief, it depends on knowing how to choose the right character to begin with. Let me show you why Ruby was wrong! How to Choose Plural Characters Let's assume that you were to translate a long list of Chinese cities or counties into English by choosing a random English word from a list of paired Simplified Chinese and traditional Chinese characters. If those characters had been further simplified in order to be mapped to the Roman alphabet, you might have picked a very impracticable list of English words. Too long and too abstract. How to Choose Plural Characters For example, you are translating the name of a city, ZhongNanSheShi. This is the way you would choose a single or randomly selected plurale. However, if you were translating the character Zhong. You would have no choice but to choose the first pluarale listed, ZhongCun, which is pronounced: ZHONG NAN SHI. And if you were to pick that random character, you would have to share the translation with the entire circle of Chinese-English language learners in the world. In fact, you can practically only translate one radical to English under this scheme. Which single Chinese character converts to English. ZhongCun? No, you can't. The first Chinese character in your list may have the tone (pren) mark, forming a plural character. Sometimes the tone (pren) is always marked, e.g. the character Huànyuàn () which means Yellow Cliff. But the tone mark alone is not always conclusive. For example, the character Zhào (, teeth) uses tone marks on both sides and does not look any different from the pren-marked character, ZhongCun. However, a learner would know immediately that these two characters do not mean the same, because only ZhongCun means teeth. If you really want to avoid the monotony of the list of characters, you can choose a Chinese word which has a "double meaning
